ITALIAN ROAST
1
Coffee comes in its raw green form, which is high in moisture, the average green coffee is around 10-12% water. A finely tuned drying phase is the necessary precondition of successful
2
Caramelization phase is generally accepted to be the period which ranges from when the coffee is fully yellow (around 300F) to first crack, it's when the water pressure created by heating the coffee causes it to burst open which occurs between 3
This phase is called Roast Development and natural oil will come out from the coffee bean. The coffee bean will crack for the second time with a smoother and softer sound than the first. These reactions, along with a coffee's drop temperature (the temperature of the roaster when the operator
4
When the lengths all these phases are combined, they form what we call a roast profile, or the set of temperature measurements at different times during the roast which the roaster operator is trying to achieve. Determining the way in which one should roast a specific coffee is a complicated subject. This is part of what makes coffee roasting
